Kidnapping

Richelle A. Rennison

In this article, I examine two controversies, North Korea (DPRK), and use a comparison of South Korea to assess institutional performance. "Multipurpose dynamics are connected to interna tives" can be differently constituted be achieved by determined politicians worked to mobilize political support for policy change. In Japan, politicians for domestic political gain than in South Korea. Sanctions were maintained to prevent human rights issues with their larger political agenda, in

KEYWORDS: kidnapping, abduction, civil society, media capture, institutional South Korean foreign policy

History is filled with people or states that have been used since antiquity to form their single most important harm. Consequently, kidnappings have been a way to distill collective fears, clarify classes and mobilize social movements for both aggression and political actors have capitalized on national weakness and the reckless accounts of heroism to demonstrate leadership. Either way, the manip
After all, Wain's forte is his vast knowledge of the nexus between politics and business during Mahathir's implementation of his development and social policies. The significance of this blend of policies, implemented through "degraded institutions," in a society exposed to rapid modernization leading to the rise of new identities, remains an issue that requires far deeper analysis. This constructive critique of Mahathir's long oversight of Malaysian politics, economy, and society reminds us that there is still much left to explore in order to understand the implications of his maverick ideas.

Edmund Terence Gomez
University of Malaya

Yusaku Horiuchi is associate professor of Economics and Government at the University of Rochester. His research interests include electoral politics, opinion, Japanese politics, and international security. He has published articles in American Journal of Politics, British Journal of Political Science, Resolution, and others.

Pei-te Lien is professor of political science at the University of Rochester. Her research focuses on race, ethnicity, gender, and the incorporation of Chinese and other minority communities into American society. She is the author of Transnational Politics of Asian American Activism and has published in Transnational Politics of Asian American Activism and other journals.

Marcus Weisgerber